The Mangla Dam is a multipurpose dam situated on the Jhelum River in the Mirpur District of Azad Kashmir, Pakistan. The village of Mangla, which sits at the mouth of the dam, serves as its namesake. The Mangla Dam was the first of the two dams constructed to reduce the water shortcoming and strengthen the irrigation system of the country as part of the Indus Basin Project. The project is designed primarily to increase the amount of water that could be used for irrigation from the flow of the Jhelum and its tributaries. Its secondary function was to generate electrical power from the irrigation releases at the artificial head of the reservoir. The project, though not initially designed as one, also works as a flood control structure by retaining water during the flood season of Monsoon.

Answer

Mangla Dam is located in Mirpur AJK near district Jhelum of Punjab. This dam was built to strengthen the irrigation system of the country as part of the Indus Basin Project and to overcome the power shortage. This dam also helps in flood control during the monsoon period, though it was not built for this purpose initially.

The markhor is the national animal of Pakistan. Markhor is a combination of Persian and Pashto words: "Mar" translates as snake and "khor" means eater. According to the region's folklore, the markhor's horns give it special abilities including being an eater or killer of snakes. It has large spiral horns. The males of this species can grow horns up to 160 centimeters (63 inches) long. Markhors are strong climbers. They can jump at least 8 feet high. They live in mountainous areas. They eat plants and are important to the ecosystems in their habitats. They have thick fur to survive in harsh environments. There has been a decline in the number of the species due to habitat loss and hunting. The largest population of markhor is currently found in Chitral National Park in Pakistan, where they now exceed 1,000 in number. Efforts are being made to conserve them.

Sunflowers are special because they can follow the sun. The plant flowers in summer. Their yellow petals and exciting presence make us feel warm and happy. Sunflowers can move their heads throughout the day, following the sun's path. They do this using a special ability called heliotropism. Sunflowers have a special hormone that helps their cells grow longer on the side that's in the shade. It makes them bend towards the sun. This clever trick helps the sunflowers get as much sunlight as possible for their growth. When you see fields of sunflowers, you'll notice they all face the same way, towards the sun. It's a beautiful example of how plants adapt to make the most of their surroundings. When the growth of the flower stalk stops and the flower is mature, the heliotropism also stops. After that, the flower faces east from that moment onward.
